

Why We Love 2319 Red Fox Drive

When we first came through the gates of Fox Bend, we knew we'd found more than a house — we'd found the setting for the life we'd built. Behind these gates, we live among neighbors who understand what it means to work hard and guard your privacy fiercely: executives, athletes, and public figures who value the same seclusion and serenity we do. It's quiet here. It's posh here. And after a demanding day, that quiet has been everything.

But quiet was never the whole story — this home was built to come alive. We designed our life around entertaining, and this house has never let us down. The formal dining room became something unexpected: a pool table anchors it now, turning “formal” into the room where our biggest parties actually happen. TVs throughout the house mean no one ever misses a game, whether it's twenty people over for a Saturday matchup or a quiet Sunday with just us. Our home office, tucked behind French doors, has given us the privacy to run a fast-paced career from home without it ever feeling like “home” — a real workspace, separate and focused, for the days that don't stop.

Outside is where this home truly shows off. Our covered patio and pool area have hosted everything from our kids' birthday parties to milestone celebrations with extended family, to nights that started with a few friends and somehow lasted until 2 a.m. around the firebowls. The backyard doesn't have one mood — it flexes for a full-blown event or for us kicking back alone after a long week.

And when the gates close behind us, this home shifts just as easily into a private sanctuary. The primary suite's own patio access has been our escape for early mornings before a fast-paced day takes over, and the she shed has doubled as a quiet cottage style flex space when needed to step away entirely. This house has held our biggest celebrations and our most private moments, often in the same week. We hope its next owners find the same balance of privacy and possibility we did.
